Learning Outcomes:

After completion of the course students are expected to be able to:

1. Apply generic marketing knowledge to the service organisation.

Students should be able to utilize the knowledge obtained through their introductory and more advanced marketing courses to the specific case of services.

2. Demonstrate how service organisations' differentiation factors affect marketing theory and practice and correspondingly be able to adapt to these.

Students must learn the many differences between services and other businesses/organizations/products and understand how these affect their marketing. Additionally they must be able to design marketing actions and tactics specifically for services taking into account the above differences.

3. Analyse and design service delivery processes in the strategic and tactical marketing contexts.

Students must learn to break down service delivery into individual steps, become able to represent this breakdown in schematic fashion e.g. service blueprints, and use these to create service delivery methods and systems that best meet the org. marketing objectives.

4. Develop marketing strategies to build and sustain customer relations with, and loyalty to the service organisation.

For services the 'people' element is disproportionately important, both in the customer sense and the employee sense. On the one hand owing to the frequent high contact level between these and on the other owing to the frequent complexity of services, the matters of 'relationships' and 'loyalty' become extremely important. Students should master these notions as well as the benefits, costs and mechanisms underlying these.

5. Indicate and explain factors and forces that disproportionately matter more to service organizations, such as 'internal marketing', 'people', 'customers role in the production process' and others.

Students must especially become able to understand the role of employees in terms of dealing with the service client and should also be able to incorporate the client into the production process, both as a co-producer and as part of the service itself.

6. Operate effectively in a multicultural environment and to adapt quickly to changing social, political, legal and economic conditions.

The subject is not a static one as it is modified and adapted to the continuous changes of a dynamic business world. Students therefore develop critical thinking and innovative approaches to be able to apply services marketing management diachronically, by understanding and taking into account the conditions and forces of any situation; including technological, economic and cultural ones.

7. Become able to practically apply/implement their knowledge in real case scenarios

Beyond theory, students should become able to mentally and effectively position knowledge gained in the wider context of the various strategic marketing management processes learnt and to develop the critical thinking and decision making intuition towards practical implementation in pragmatic conditions.

Course Content:

1. Service marketing concepts and new perspectives on marketing in the service economy.

The subject includes an overview of the importance of services in modern economies and societies, trends in services, the differentiating factors of services' marketing, and the eight 'Ps' of services' marketing.

2. Customer behavior in service encounters

The subject includes the role of customers in service design and delivery, and the idiosyncratic nature of services customer behavior owing to the above-mentioned differences.

3. Developing service concepts: core and supplementary elements

The subject presents the students the service product as different layers, including the core service, all the supplementary services and the 'flower' of service.

4. Distributing services through physical and electronic channels

The subject touches upon the ability of services to be offered through 'cyberchannels' thereby significantly altering both the product itself, as well as its potential target markets, delivery methods and the 'Place' tactic in general.

5. Exploring business models: pricing and revenue management

The subject explores pricing of services, the ability to adopt multiple pricing strategies simultaneously, the element of 'value' when setting a price, issues such as risk and brand and the way they affect pricing, as well as methods to develop the pricing of services.

6. Educating customers and promoting the value proposition

In services, educating the customer to become an effective and efficient co-producer, but also part of the service product itself, is an essential part of services marketing communications. This section explores this matter as well the importance and ways of building the service value offering.

7. Positioning services in competitive markets

The subject expands on the above specifically in the context of positioning.

8. Designing and managing service processes

The subject includes the breakdown of service design and delivery into individual steps, its presentation in a schematic fashion using flowcharts, service blueprints etc, and using these to create service delivery methods and systems that best meet the marketing objectives of the organization

Learning Activities and Teaching Methods:

Lectures, discussions with class participation, practical group exercises, case studies, videos and internet presentations, guest lecture(s).

Assessment Methods:

Final Exam, Project work, Scientific Paper Analysis
